Dear Mr. Brown,

We write to you in response to news that you recently purchased a pet monkey for your daughter. As experts in the field of primate care, we are concerned that this choice will prove to be dangerous to you, your daughter and your monkey, and it sends the wrong message to your fans.

The North American Primate Sanctuary Alliance (NAPSA) is a coalition of ten of the leading primate sanctuaries on the continent. In our sanctuaries, we care for over 700 primates, many of whom were formerly privately owned and living in human homes. We are contacted daily by people who – just like you – purchased a baby monkey and then lived to regret it. Monkeys quickly grow to be strong, cunning and difficult to manage. They can transfer disease and destroy your home. They can bite and injure their owners, including children. It is simply not possible to fulfill the unique needs of your monkey within a private home. Once you have decided that you no longer wish to keep your monkey, it can be problematic to find an accredited sanctuary who has space to take him. Most primate sanctuaries have lengthy waiting lists.

Attached is NAPSA's Position Statement on the private ownership of primates so you may learn why it is so harmful.

As a public figure, we urge you to use this opportunity to show your fans that the decision to gift your daughter a wild animal was not in the best interest of you or the monkey. We can help you place your monkey at an accredited primate sanctuary where he can enjoy a healthy life with others of his own kind. This would be the next best thing to life in the wild.

Please use this opportunity to teach your daughter and your fans that respecting animals is more important than owning them.

Sincerely,

Advocacy Position Statement Private Ownership of Primates

The North American Primate Sanctuary Alliance (NAPSA) is opposed to the private ownership of primates.

Unlike dogs and cats, apes and monkeys are not domesticated animals. Non-human primates are extremely social animals whose normal development requires the company of others of their own kind. Ideally, primates should live in the wild. Their natural habitats include species-typical social groups that allow them to learn from their families and have a rich emotional life. In reality, however, there is an active industry that breeds primates to sell as pets in human homes.

As infants, primates in the pet trade are removed from their mothers years before they would naturally separate, which causes psychological suffering that manifests throughout their entire life. Teeth are often removed for ease of handling, which can limit the foods they can eat. Qualified veterinary care for pet primates can be difficult, if not impossible, to find.

Primates are inquisitive animals whose proper care requires daily mental stimulation and extensive physical activity, which is often impossible for the average household to provide. Primates kept in human homes are rarely, if ever, monitored by animal welfare officials, which means they are often kept in unsuitable living conditions resulting in neglect, mistreatment, and myriad psychological and physical ailments that can lead to death. There are a range of zoonotic diseases that are transmitted by primates and can be harmful, even fatal, to humans.

Once primates reach adolescence, which can be just a few years into a 40+ year lifespan, they inevitably become too unmanageable to handle. Primates can and will bite. They have strong jaws and sharp teeth, and bites can result in significant and potentially fatal injuries to humans. Realizing that living with an adult primate is not sustainable, owners often seek to surrender their pets or are forced to surrender them due to a threat to public safety.

Many primates that were privately owned end up living in roadside zoos, recycled as breeders to produce the next generation of ill-fated pets, or in other abusive situations. In the best cases, former pets may end up in a NAPSA member sanctuary, where they live their remaining years in an enriched environment more typical to their species. Even in sanctuary, former pets often struggle with learning how to socialize with other primates and many exhibit abnormal behaviors for the rest of their lives.

The private ownership of primates is never in the best interest of the animal or the owner.
